

Conservation Translocations as a Tool for Rewilding

Katherine Bickerton

A key component of most rewilding projects is the translocation of plant and animal species to restore ecosystem function, however translocations are a complex process both biologically and socially. Here I will explore the reintroduction process and suggest the areas where mathematical and statistical methods could aid decision making and the understanding of complex biological systems.